Bissell-Havran, Joanna M.; Loken, erik; McHale, Susan M. Mothers' differential treatment of adolescent siblings: predicting college attendance of sisters versus brothers.

Current estimates suggest that by 2015, 60% of college students will be women, a change since 1970 when 59% were men. We investigated family dynamics that might explain the growing gender gap in college attendance, focusing on an ethnically diverse sample of 522 mixed sex sibling dyads. We examined whether the difference between sisters' and brothers' reports of their mothers' expectations for, and involvement in, their education during adolescence predicted their differential odds of college attendance seven years later. The results suggest that within-family social comparisons the difference between brothers' and sisters' reports of their mothers' educational involvement may play a role in sisters' and brothers' choices about attending college.
